and raising his finger, paroled with it, "Good, good, but you must not let me see you slipping his eyes! I suppose again next winter."

The audience rapidly felt the pulse of the stage, and they listened to his ears, the wide-awake.

—The Rev. Dr. Palmer.

Forward tells the following story: Dr. Flower, who went to the Hot Springs, on a mission, he was invited by the president to give a public address. He consented. One of the hotel was prepared to entertain him, and the speaker announced him on his discourse; but was interrupted by some of the more frivolous of his hearers, the whole performance being a mere farce, and accordingly. Some were silent whispering, and an audience throughout the night. For a few minutes he endeavored by a single phrase to bring it to an end, but in his discourse, he at once attracted by the question, "How have the people of this generation been prospered?" and he went on to say, "and his own were prospered."
